Identifying DNA as the Genetic Material

DNA was identified as the genetic material relatively recently, in the 1940s. Theoretical studies were conducted prior to that all added up to the discovery: i.e. Griffith's work on the early 1930s, used i.e. Hershey and Chase's work in 1952. Together, these experimental findings ultimately established DNA as the genetic material.

Griffith finds a "transforming principle."

In 1928, a British microbiologist named Frederick Griffith discovered that Streptococcus pneumoniae (the bacterium that causes pneumonia) has two strains: one virulent (disease-causing) and one non-virulent (harmless). He found that the non-virulent strain could become virulent when mixed with the virulent strain's extract.

Griffith used bacteria with a capsule of the virulent strain containing bacteria and the non-virulent strain without a capsule. He found that the non-virulent strain became virulent when mixed with the virulent strain's extract, but not when mixed with the non-virulent strain's extract.

Griffith concluded that some "transforming principle" from the virulent strain was responsible for the transformation. He called this "transforming principle" because it was a substance that changed the non-virulent bacteria into virulent ones. This was the first experimental evidence of the "transforming principle."

Griffith's work on "transforming principle" was the first step in identifying DNA as the genetic material. This experiment showed that the transforming principle was a substance that could change the non-virulent bacteria into virulent ones.

Griffith's experiment on transformation

Griffith found that transformation is occurring when he found the results.

Griffith's experiment on transformation

Griffith's experiment showed that the transforming principle was a substance that could change the non-virulent bacteria into virulent ones.
