Abstract Background: While the need for training in new technology skills is widely acknowledged, training is often not available, and therefore people in need of it are left out. This paper explores ways to deliver training through open access. Methods: The authors used Facebook as a technology-enabled social network to disseminate an open access training website, www.facebook.com/learn2code, with the intention of reaching underserved populations. Results: The website has been visited by more than 100,000 people in 14 months, and the authors are currently working on ways to make the website more accessible to underserved populations.
