Further genetic studies of some, nonrecombining selfing sites, and their association with recombining sites on the same chromosome suggest different evolutionary histories for the two sets of nuclear markers. This is consistent with the fact that chloroplast markers have not recombined in any examined population. These results and some others indicate that the selfing sites may constitute nonrecombining, or close linkage, or higher order linkage in some way or another, or have other properties that limit processes of recombination and suggest that chloroplast markers are highly informative.

Human genetic studies are scarce, with research suggesting that, and that variations will increase likelihood of human health issues, especially for children. The study aims to explore genetic, social, and environmental factors influencing children's health and well-being, as well as potential interventions.
