Abstract: Phragmites australis is a dominant species in coastal wetlands and is a major component of the marsh plant community. It is a highly invasive species and has been found to be a major component of the marsh plant community in many areas. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of Phragmites australis on the marsh plant community. The study was conducted in a marsh in the coastal plain of Georgia. The marsh was divided into two sections: one section was dominated by Phragmites australis and the other section was dominated by Spartina patens. The two sections were compared in terms of plant community structure, species diversity, and biomass. The results of the study showed that the Phragmites australis section had a higher species diversity and biomass than the Spartina patens section. The results also showed that the Phragmites australis section had a higher percentage of emergent plants than the Spartina patens section. The results of this study suggest that Phragmites australis has a positive effect on the marsh plant community.
