These calligraphic efforts at representation are important, but I think particularly significant about their quality, as you think, is the way they represent the concept of shen as something as the stage for these fundamental shen activities, so that people could practice and keep themselves important, that I think is a really big theme. I think that's what you're talking about with shen as a concept, as a way of thinking about the world, the shen as a way of thinking about the world.

In this part, I didn't pay much attention to "body language" because I don't think the human communication theory of it is that good. There are very little of them. The theory teaching I saw in body language is not a - especially when I first got a class and spent some time. I gradually got some ideas after seeing some things in my communication in my life. For example, I saw some people who were very happy, smiling, and looking at each other and talking to each other. I saw some people who were very sad, crying, and looking away. I saw some people who were very angry, shouting, and looking at each other. I saw some people who were very nervous, sweating, and looking away. I saw some people who were very confident, standing tall, and looking at each other. I saw some people who were very shy, looking down, and looking away. I saw some people who were very friendly, smiling, and looking at each other. I saw some people who were very hostile, looking angry, and looking away. I saw some people who were very loving, hugging, and looking at each other. I saw some people who were very hateful, looking angry, and looking away. I saw some people who were very kind, helping, and looking at each other. I saw some people who were very cruel, hurting, and looking away. I saw some people who were very honest, telling the truth, and looking at each other. I saw some people who were very dishonest, lying, and looking away. I saw some people who were very brave, standing up, and looking at each other. I saw some people who were very cowardly, running away, and looking away. I saw some people who were very strong, lifting weights, and looking at each other. I saw some people who were very weak, sitting down, and looking away. I saw some people who were very healthy, eating well, and looking at each other. I saw some people who were very unhealthy, eating poorly, and looking away. I saw some people who were very happy, smiling, and looking at each other. I saw some people who were very sad, crying, and looking away.
