In a blastula, the cells are located on or near the surface of the embryo and as yet do not exist in layers, so the area of the future germ layers during the blastula stage is referred to as presumptive. For example, that area of the blastula which is destined to form the neural ectoderm is called the presumptive neural ectoderm.

The early biologists constructed maps of the blastulae based on the trajectories of tagged or marked cells. They showed the fate of every region of the blastula under normal developmental conditions and were referred to as fate maps. According to these maps (Fig. 12.4), similar patterns exist in all vertebrates. Regardless of the specific shape of the blastula (round or disc-shaped), the organ forming areas are arranged in a pattern around the presumptive notochordal region.
