Background

Low back pain (LBP) is a common condition that affects a large proportion of the population. It is a leading cause of disability and is associated with significant economic burden. The etiology of LBP is multifactorial, involving a combination of mechanical, physiological, and psychosocial factors. Understanding the underlying mechanisms of LBP is crucial for developing effective prevention and treatment strategies.

Methods

This study employed a cross-sectional design to investigate the prevalence and risk factors of LBP in a community-based sample. Data were collected through a series of questionnaires and physical examinations. The primary outcome measure was the prevalence of LBP, defined as pain in the lower back region lasting for at least two weeks. Secondary outcomes included the identification of risk factors such as age, gender, occupation, and lifestyle factors.

Results

The study found that the prevalence of LBP was approximately 25% in the community-based sample. The prevalence was higher in individuals aged 40 years and older, and in those with sedentary occupations. Lifestyle factors such as smoking and alcohol consumption were also associated with an increased risk of LBP. The results suggest that LBP is a significant public health problem that requires further research to identify effective prevention and treatment strategies.

Conclusions

This study provides valuable insights into the prevalence and risk factors of LBP in a community-based sample. The findings highlight the need for further research to understand the underlying mechanisms of LBP and to develop targeted interventions to reduce its burden on individuals and society.
