

■ Prepare your final work on egg white and white photographs, or even better a slab of foam core, adapting it to the format you have previously identified. Complete your drawing, and when you want to simplify things, draw or through narrow eyes. Afterward, compare the photo with the drawing, also with other photos, and correct the details as you see. Also focus on the drawing of the contours themselves, and on whether they are too obvious and they are all based on the most obvious.

■ Copy a picture by an artist that you like in order to reproduce his or her style of handling, compare it with those of other artists and with your own personal techniques and way of producing a drawing.

■ Copy a drawing or sculpture piece of cloth and try to reproduce the movement and volume through the folds, using various techniques and handling types. Describe the structural aspect of each fold by drawing on paper, work on these surfaces, corresponding to dark, middle and light tones.

■ Draw a model from real life, spending half without studying volumes and spaces in their rooms. Use the techniques and process that you have discovered about real life in your composition.

■ Experiment with different techniques, work with dry pencil, chalk, pastel, oil, red, and so on, and so on. Define the various visible parts, water, colors, and so on techniques.

Look for new combinations and textures, without using your own eyes and without any type of direct modeling or sketch. These ideas, such as the photograph of a white photograph and directly related to the subject (or, as a more modern expression, use a photo editing program to create a white photo without and white). Then draw a drawing about the photo, including the various contours and elements, paying special attention to the most differences between the foreground and background to get the right light effect.

■ Study the human and animal forms, particularly working with a range of photographs.
