

Boil-Off Gas handling onboard LNG fuelled ships

By Dr. Ravi K. Sankar, Director, Research and Development, Indian Institute of Technology, Kharagpur

Boil-off gas (BOG) is a by-product of the liquefaction process. It is a mixture of methane and ethane, which is released from the LNG during the liquefaction process. The BOG is a valuable resource, as it can be used as a fuel for the ship's engines. However, the BOG must be handled carefully, as it is highly flammable and can cause explosions if not properly managed. The BOG handling system on an LNG fuelled ship typically consists of a BOG compressor, a BOG storage tank, and a BOG flare. The BOG compressor is used to compress the BOG into a liquid state, which is then stored in the BOG storage tank. The BOG flare is used to burn off the BOG if it is not needed as a fuel.

The BOG handling system on an LNG fuelled ship is a complex system that requires careful design and operation. The BOG compressor must be able to handle the high pressure and temperature of the BOG. The BOG storage tank must be able to store the BOG safely and without leaking. The BOG flare must be able to burn off the BOG safely and without causing an explosion. The BOG handling system must also be able to handle the BOG during the ship's normal operation, as well as during emergency situations. The BOG handling system is a critical part of the LNG fuelled ship's safety system, and it must be designed and operated correctly to ensure the ship's safety.
