

Normally, most consumers are rational. Producers have to determine if possible, on the profit motive, which product to produce and allocate the scarce resources. The rational choice theory states that in producing, one will be using scarce resources to produce

Public Goods (Education, Health, Police, Defense)

Private Goods (Wheat, Clothing, Cars, Milk, Movies, Supermarkets, Medical Care)

Characteristics of the two types of goods are (non-rivalry, excludability, etc.) regulation, consumption, and their delivery and production

Understanding the two different markets (the public and private goods)

This can be summarized below:

	Private Goods	Public Goods	Private Goods	Public Goods
Private Goods	The government can supply all the private goods possible	All government resources will produce goods	The private sector usually supply public goods in private The public sector supply non-rivalrous goods in public	Government will not supply all the public goods The private sector supply goods in the market The government supply goods in the market
Public Goods	Private individuals have Total Excludability Non-rivalrous Non-excludable Rivalrous Excludable	Government supply all the public goods Government will not supply all the private goods	Market supply all goods in the private sector Government supply goods in the public sector	Government supply all the public goods Private supply goods in the market Government supply goods in the market

The different structure of the economy

	Private Goods	Public Goods
Private Goods	The price of the private goods is determined by the market forces. The price of the private goods is determined by the market forces.	Supply, demand, and price
Public Goods	The price of the public goods is determined by the government. The price of the public goods is determined by the government.	Supply, demand, and price
Private Goods	The price of the private goods is determined by the market forces. The price of the private goods is determined by the market forces.	Supply, demand, and price

The private goods are very cheap for the private sector because they are produced through a process of self-interest. The public goods are very expensive for the government because they are produced through a process of self-interest.
