

HYDROSTATIC DRIVE MOTOR

Two motors are used to drive the skidder. They are mounted to the input side of the transmission. A splined coupling connects the motor shaft to the transmission input shaft.

The motor is an axial piston, variable displacement type. It forms a closed loop circuit with the pump.

High pressure oil from the pump enters the motor via port 'A' or port 'B', depending on the direction of travel. The oil is directed to the back of a set of pistons in the motor's rotary group. The pistons push against the back of the drive shaft at an angle causing it to rotate.

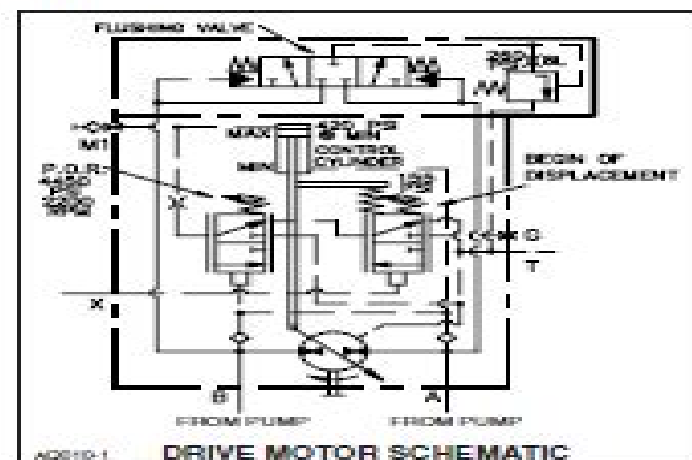

The angle of the pistons relative to the drive shaft determine the speed of the motor and the available torque. Reducing the angle provides increased speed with less torque. Increasing the angle will reduce the speed and provide more torque.

The angle of the pistons is variable and is changed by an internal control cylinder that receives high pressure oil via the MOTORS pressure override valve (P.O.R.) and a displacement control spool.

The displacement control spool is operated by pilot pressure from the forward and reverse foot pedals. When sufficient pressure from the pedals is directed to the spool, it shifts against a spring and directs oil past the P.O.R. valve to the displacement control cylinder thus decreasing the displacement of the motor. Removal of the pressure signal from the foot pedals will cause the displacement control spool to return to the neutral position, shutting off the pressure to the displacement control cylinder thus increasing displacement to maximum.

The spool in the P.O.R. valve is moved by system pressure from the high pressure side of the loop. When the P.O.R. spool moves as a result of high pressures it reduces the pressure directed to the displacement control cylinder. The reduced pressure will cause the displacement control piston to move. The point at which the displacement control spool begins to move is known as "begin of regulation set point" or "pressure override set point".

The MOTOR P.O.R. set point must be correctly set for the system to function properly. Refer to DRIVE MOTOR PRESSURE SETTINGS for REXROTH PUMP AND MOTORS or SAUER PUMP AND REXROTH MOTORS in THIS SECTION.
