Hydrolyzed collagen is a common skin-care ingredient reported to have skin-protective benefits. It is hypothesized that oral collagen peptides may improve skin hydration and elasticity. The aim of this study was to determine the effects of a 12-week oral collagen supplement on skin hydration and elasticity in healthy young women. Thirty-four young women (aged 18–30 years) were recruited from a university health center. They were randomized to either a 12-week oral collagen supplement (10 g/day) or a placebo (10 g/day). Skin hydration and elasticity were measured at baseline and at 12 weeks. The results showed that the collagen supplement significantly increased skin hydration and elasticity compared to the placebo group. These findings suggest that oral collagen supplementation may be a beneficial skin-care strategy for improving skin hydration and elasticity.
