

Lesson Overview

18.3 Building the Tree of Life

The process of identifying and naming all known organisms, both living and extinct, is a huge first step toward the goal of systematics.

The real challenge, however, is to group everything—from bacteria to dinosaurs to blue whales—in a way that reflects their evolutionary relationships.

Over the years, new information and new ways of studying organisms have produced major changes in Linnaeus's original scheme for organizing living things.
