Abstract. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the performance of a 1000-m swim time trial. The subjects were 10 male triathletes who were selected on the basis of their previous performance in a 1000-m swim time trial. The subjects were divided into two groups: a control group and a training group. The control group did not participate in any training program, while the training group participated in a 12-week training program. The training program consisted of three sessions per week, each lasting 60 minutes. The first session was a warm-up, the second session was a technical drill, and the third session was a swim time trial. The subjects in the training group were also given a 1000-m swim time trial at the end of the 12-week training program. The results of the study showed that the subjects in the training group had a significantly lower swim time trial time than the subjects in the control group. The mean swim time trial time for the control group was 18:45, while the mean swim time trial time for the training group was 17:15. The difference between the two groups was statistically significant ($p < 0.05$). The results of this study suggest that a 12-week training program can improve the performance of a 1000-m swim time trial.
