

captured when a double magnum charge was fired into five in thickness in this area, assured greater than rupture point.

It was found to be a means that so far, well in excess of all strength, ripped this. It couldn't have been with dynamite.

shows a destroyed Python. The forward half of the barrel was filled with lead slugs to the point shown. The barrel ruptured where the last slug was fired.

Difficult to know the real facts, one thing is clear- the owner was a fool. He was firing his own creations. It appears that the first five bullets were fired into the bore by magnum primers, only, and- by all indications, the barrel was fired with a double magnum charge.

In the name of discussion; let's say that a reloading book lists a load at 4 grains (copper) based on eight grains of a given powder. If, for example, the same powder (or only .4 grain) jumps chamber pressure past the limit for the .357 magnum case- it seems that only a fool would use a .4 grain. This being the case, what on earth do you call a fellow who fires five empties with a double magnum charge?
