

OUR STORMY SUN AND SPACE WEATHER

On September 1st and 2nd, 1859, the telegraph network in the U.S. and Europe went down. A mysterious event sent mysterious electric currents through telegraph lines, damaging the wires and causing electric spark discharges that shocked operators. At the same time, compasses started acting strangely as their magnetized needles spun randomly and were unable to point toward the Earth's poles. Massive auroras suddenly lighted the skies at high and mid latitudes. Strikingly, the auroras were visible even at near tropical latitudes over Jamaica, Hawaii, Bahamas, and Cuba.

This event was later called the Carrington event, after the British astronomer Richard Carrington. On the morning of September 1, 1859, Carrington used his telescope to observe the Sun. Above a huge group of sunspots, he noticed the appearance of an extremely bright light, which scientists thought was related to the mysterious disturbances detailed above.

In 1989, a similar event shut down power grids from the Hydro-Québec generating station in Canada, leaving it million people in darkness for 9 hours. In December of 2009, another event disrupted communications with satellites and the Global Positioning System (GPS) for about 10 minutes, endangering commercial airplanes dependent on these systems for safe navigation.

It turned out that these stormy events on the Earth were caused by storms on our Sun. They demonstrated that changes in the Sun's radiation and solar storms can have negative effects on our civilization. Indeed, solar storms endanger astronauts, disable satellite electronics, affect weather patterns, disrupt radio communications and damage power grids.
