

■ Learning with Experience

There are three ways to learn about a new technology or process: by reading, by watching, and by doing. Reading is the most common way to learn, but it is also the least effective. Reading is a passive activity, and it is difficult to retain information from a book or article. Watching is a more active activity, and it is easier to retain information from a video or demonstration. Doing is the most effective way to learn, and it is the only way to truly understand a technology or process. When you are learning a new technology or process, it is important to use all three methods. Reading gives you a basic understanding of the technology or process. Watching gives you a visual understanding of the technology or process. Doing gives you a hands-on understanding of the technology or process. By using all three methods, you can learn a new technology or process more effectively and more efficiently.
