Liver Transplantation - ECAB, 2013-01-10 Liver Transplantation LT until recently the forbidden fruit is the newest the sexiest the most controversial and arguably the most technically challenging subspecialty of Surgical Gastroenterology to have mushroomed in India In a journey spanning 12 years 28 centers and 1500 liver transplants we imagined there would be a gripping story to tell It was only appropriate then that we chose to inaugurate the series with an overview of Liver Transplantation In the last 2 decades the field has seen rapid progress with 1 and 5 year patient survival improving from 80% and 50% to 90% and 80% respectively owing to technical refinement and better immunosuppressants intensive care and patient monitoring Despite being a relatively new entrant into the field India can now boast of at least some islands of excellence that have caught up with the best in the west This means the evolution of LT in these centers has been fast forwarded up a steep curve We have come a long way from the point of every LT being considered an experimental procedure with much media and public hype to one where it is accepted as a successful and durable panacea for all liver failure The popularity of teams running successful programs in India has swung from being ostracized when the chips were down to being celebrated and envied when the going became good The focus has shifted from immediate to long term survival from surgical heroism to building multidisciplinary teams from anecdotal to hard data and from media reports to scientific publications Fly by night operations are on the decline as realization of their futility dawns on new centers and transplant teams They are now happier to take the longer route of developing trained in house teams After spending a good part of the last decade honing the technique of living donor liver transplantation we are becoming more sensitive to the morbidity and mortality risks to the living liver donor We want to minimize the liver volume removed from the donor and want to develop techniques of minimal access More importantly we want to train our guns back on pushing donation after brain or cardiac death We have begun to maintain databases are getting into audit mode and want a National registry We want standardized treatment guidelines and training curricula We want to take part in multicenter trials and further meaningful clinical and laboratory research As a community the liver transplant doctors of India are on a warpath of progress We want it all and we want it now The first step to the march into the future is to size up the past and the present That is what we have attempted to do in this volume
