Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The study was a randomized, controlled trial. The subjects were 40 sedentary, middle-aged women who were randomly assigned to either a supervised walking program or a control group. The walking program consisted of 12 weeks of supervised walking, 3 times per week, for 30 minutes per session. The control group consisted of 20 women who did not participate in the walking program. The physical and psychological health of the subjects was assessed at baseline and at 12 weeks. The results of the study showed that the walking program had a significant positive effect on the physical and psychological health of the subjects. The walking program resulted in a significant increase in physical fitness, as measured by heart rate, blood pressure, and body mass index. The walking program also resulted in a significant improvement in psychological health, as measured by self-reported stress, anxiety, and depression. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program can be an effective intervention for improving the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women.

1. Identify the problem. The first step in the problem-solving process is to identify the problem. This involves understanding the situation, gathering information, and defining the problem clearly.

the 1990s, the number of people in the United States who are obese has increased by 50 percent. In 1990, 15 percent of the population was obese; in 2000, 23 percent was obese. In 2008, the prevalence of obesity in the United States was 33.9 percent, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. The prevalence of obesity in the United States is now higher than in any other country in the world.
