Which makes the most reliable new cars? Consumer Reports' annual reliability survey answers that question. Based on data from more than 100,000 owners, the survey ranks 32 car brands and 100 models by how often they break down or need repairs.

Based on 2010 data, the top brands are Toyota, Honda, and Volvo. These brands have the fewest problems, and their models are the most reliable. The bottom brands are Saturn, Buick, and Lincoln. These brands have the most problems, and their models are the least reliable.

Consumer Reports' annual reliability survey is the most comprehensive survey of its kind. It covers all new cars, from economy to luxury, and includes all major brands. The survey is based on data from more than 100,000 owners, who report how often their cars break down or need repairs.

There are many reasons why some brands are more reliable than others. Some brands use higher quality parts and materials. Some brands have better engineering and manufacturing processes. Some brands have better customer service and support.

One of the most important reasons why some brands are more reliable than others is the quality of the parts and materials they use. Higher quality parts and materials are more likely to last longer and perform better. This is why brands that use higher quality parts and materials are more reliable.

Another important reason why some brands are more reliable than others is the quality of the engineering and manufacturing processes. Brands that have better engineering and manufacturing processes are more likely to produce cars that are more reliable.

Finally, customer service and support are also important factors in a car's reliability. Brands that have better customer service and support are more likely to have cars that are more reliable. This is because better customer service and support can help to identify and solve problems more quickly.

Consumer Reports' annual reliability survey is a valuable tool for consumers. It helps them to identify the most reliable brands and models, and it helps them to make more informed decisions when buying a new car.
