back resulting from raising heavy implements over rough terrain with the control valve in the latching position.

Control Valve. The control valve, Figure 5, directs flow of oil for raising or lowering an implement or in shift control, flow applied to the control valve actuates the valve. When in position control, oil on the left side actuates the valve.

Relief Valve. The relieving valve, Figure 6, is normally open. The pressure of this valve sets whether the oil from the pump is directed to the cylinder to raise an implement or is to the reservoir.

Check Valve. The back pressure valve, Figure 7, allows a constant pressure of low magnitude to be maintained on the relieving valve.

Increased tractor hydraulic system sensitivity and durability which are desired in certain implement applications can now be obtained by using two special control valves, control valve loadings and an isolator. In standard hydraulic systems flow which are available for power units. The control valve, control valve loading and flow can be supplied in all Ford Tractors with the standard type hydraulic system.

Increased sensitivity is provided by the new control valve and loading in the following manner. The left hand of the control valve is chambered so that the reaction on the top link is directed to move the control valve forward to a lift position. This, in effect, means that resistance required by changing draft conditions will be of a smaller magnitude. A smaller diameter hole on both the inlet and outlet sides of the relieving valve, means that as oil is introduced to the valve, the pressure loading in the system will be at a lower rate. When the smaller magnitude reaction loading effect to the new control valve will be desired and desired.

A lift incorporated in the loading in place of the flow valve and a low valve in the hydraulic line increases the rate of flow of the implement. The rate of flow is faster because it acts as the draft reaction in a latching position and the control valve moves to a latching position, the lower rate of the flow valve is required.

It is recommended that whenever the new control valve and control valve loading are installed in a tractor that the hydraulic filter also be installed. This filter can be installed in tractor where oil supply hydraulic parts are used and where decreased maintenance provided by the new hydraulic pump is not required.

4. Hydraulic Control System Oil Flow

Normal Position. When the pump is continuously in forcing oil to the hydraulic system, whenever the system is operating, the oil will be returned to the reservoir or sump. When the control valve is closed, oil is pumped into the pressure line which is closed when the transmission back pressure and check valve are closed. A drilled hole and pressure ring under the control valve isolator passage in the check and back pressure valves. The check and back pressure valve are closed, therefore, oil will flow down the passage leading to the relieving valve chamber. It will not flow to the control valve chamber in the forward loading and apply pressure against the rear face of the relieving valve to hold it in the closed position. The oil will continue to flow down the passage ring to the control valve leading to the control ring and over the oil.
