Abstract. Staphylococcus aureus is the most common cause of skin infections. The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of S. aureus in the skin of healthy children and to identify the strains by their antibiotic resistance patterns. A total of 100 skin swabs were collected from healthy children in a tertiary care hospital. The isolates were identified by Gram stain, culture on methicillin agar, and coagulase test. The antibiotic resistance patterns were determined by disk diffusion. The prevalence of S. aureus was 100%. The isolates were resistant to 1-10 antibiotics. The most common resistance pattern was resistance to 1 antibiotic (50%). The most common antibiotic resistance was to methicillin (100%).

These findings have important implications for the design of the training program. First, the results suggest that the training program should focus on improving the knowledge and skills of the participants in the areas of risk management, financial management, and organizational management. Second, the results suggest that the training program should be tailored to the needs of the participants, who are likely to have different levels of knowledge and experience. Third, the results suggest that the training program should be evaluated to ensure that it is effective in achieving its goals.
