1799-1800 The Revolutionary Period

Historical Information:

1799- 1800 -- Why was this period known as "The Age of Reason?" Remember that the writing of permanent importance from this era is mostly political writing. Keep in mind that during these years the American colonists reached a point where they were no longer able to tolerate British rule. The colonists united and took a stand against Britain. The Revolution was successful, and a proud and practical nation emerged. There was a shift in American consciousness from an "other worldly" to a "this worldly" viewpoint.

1800- 1840 A Growing Nation

Historical Information:

1800- 1840 -- During this period the rapid growth of the nation brought with it an upsurge of national pride and identity. The westward expansion of the U.S. and its explosive growth in population had profound effects on American life and literature. The Romantics do not necessarily write about love. Romanticism can be viewed as an artistic movement, or a state of mind, or both. Romantic writers favor the imagination over reason, intuition over facts. The Romantic writers have an intense interest in and reverence for nature. Romanticism focuses on mystery--the strange and fantastic aspects of human experience. Unlike the 18th century writers who focused on reason, logic and scientific observation, the Romantics stressed the examination of inner feelings and emotions and the use of the imagination. The Romantic movement was also characterized by an interest in nature and the supernatural, a strong belief in democracy, and a deep awareness of the past. Death was a favorite subject of the Romantic poets as it allowed them to celebrate the process of change in nature and human life. With the establishment of the American identity, writers also began focusing on distinctly American themes and delving into the history of a young nation.
