3. As the chairman of your youth forum, write a speech to be delivered on the occasion of your forum's five year anniversary.

SECTION B

Read the following passage carefully and answer questions on it

Awa peeped from behind the straw mat which was the door of her mother's confine. The moon was a perfect ball hanging inches above the leafy protrudes of the mango tree of the entrance of the compound. When Awa was younger, she used to try plucking the golden ball from the sky with a stick. That was along time ago she sighted. Life has changed suddenly; her father had died unexpectedly leaving his wives and children in a state of shows and confusion

At the end of the forty days of mourning, Awa's mother left for her own village to attend to her very ill mother. Awa was waiting for the entire compound to fall asleep. It was the night that would decide her life. She had to get to that mango tree without being seen, only then she knew she would be free she held the few pieces of clothing she possessed tightly to her chest and stepped gingerly into the moon-washed compound. By the time she reaches the entrance she was sweating in spite of the cool of the night air.

Awa stepped quickly into the dirt track which linked to the rest of the world. She was on her way. Awa knew her life was in danger but she was ready to take the risk. She stayed close to the ledger along the road, ready to dash for cover at the sight or sound of any human or animal.

The moon proved a good companion, staying constantly with her. Occasionally, a thin veil of white cloud would drift over its surface. Awa took delight in watching how the moon would burst out from behind the cloud, puffing as it were hurrying to get somewhere. The crickets kept up a deafening orchestration of unfinished mites, while the frogs, in accompaniment, threw in their numbing bass notes of regular interval. Awa did not stop to rest; fear of the living and the dead catching up with her, kept her moving. She walked throughout the night.

The moon was getting paler as if it had done its duty by her and was leaving her to the care of the sun which not quite ready to wake, was stretching sleepy pink fingers over the clouds in the distance. The bush was giving way to little patches of vegetable garden. Fear clasped Awa's chest in iron grips. She struggled to breathe and there was no place to hide now. She had made it to Ojone's compound before the first call to prayer which would wake the whole village. Already in the distance, she could hear the crow of the first cock to waken. She came to a turn in the road and there was Ojone's compound; she quickened her pace. A hungry looking dog sitting in the middle of the dirt track tried a few weary barks at her, but she throw a stone at it slinked away.

Questions:

- A. What two expressions in the passage show poverty?
- B. Give three words that show the sound of animals from passage
