Yahoo user sues over personal data breach

A Yahoo user has sued the web portal company for negligence for allowing more than 450,000 user names and passwords to be stolen from one of its sites.

Jeff Allan of New Hampshire, whose login credentials were posted online after a hacker infiltrated a company database on 11 July, has filed a complaint in federal court in San Jose, California.

Allan said in his complaint that Yahoo failed to adequately safeguard his personal information, according to Bloomberg.

He is seeking an order requiring Yahoo to compensate him and other users for account fraud and for measures they have had to take to protect accounts put at risk by the breach.

On 12 July, Yahoo confirmed that hackers had stolen an unencrypted file containing login credentials for Yahoo and other accounts, such as Google's Gmail and Microsoft's Hotmail, from Yahoo Voices, an online publishing application for sharing information.
