

Internal Structure
Lecture 1: The Heart and Blood Vessels

The heart is a muscular organ that pumps blood throughout the body. It is composed of four chambers: the right and left atria and ventricles. The right atrium receives deoxygenated blood from the body, and the right ventricle pumps it to the lungs. The left atrium receives oxygenated blood from the lungs, and the left ventricle pumps it to the rest of the body. The heart is surrounded by a double-walled sac called the pericardium, which contains a fluid that lubricates the heart's movement.

The heart's internal structure is highly complex and specialized. The right atrium is divided into two parts: the superior vena cava, which receives blood from the upper body, and the inferior vena cava, which receives blood from the lower body. The right ventricle is divided into two parts: the pulmonary trunk, which pumps blood to the lungs, and the right ventricular outflow tract, which pumps blood to the lungs. The left atrium is divided into two parts: the pulmonary veins, which receive oxygenated blood from the lungs, and the left atrial appendage, which is a small pouch that can sometimes become a source of blood clots. The left ventricle is divided into two parts: the aorta, which pumps blood to the rest of the body, and the left ventricular outflow tract, which pumps blood to the aorta.

The heart's internal structure is also highly specialized for its function. The heart muscle is composed of specialized cells called cardiomyocytes, which are arranged in a spiral pattern around the heart. This spiral arrangement allows the heart to contract in a coordinated manner, pumping blood out of the heart. The heart is also surrounded by a network of blood vessels called the coronary arteries, which supply the heart with oxygen and nutrients.
