The effect of atmospheric pressure on indoor air circulation is a complex phenomenon that involves the interaction of various factors. The primary factor is the difference in pressure between the indoor and outdoor environments. This difference is caused by the building's structure, which creates a sealed space. The indoor air is then forced to move through the building's ventilation system, which is designed to maintain a constant pressure. The effect of atmospheric pressure on indoor air circulation is also influenced by the building's location and the surrounding environment. For example, buildings located in areas with high atmospheric pressure will experience a different effect than those located in areas with low atmospheric pressure. The effect of atmospheric pressure on indoor air circulation is also influenced by the building's design and construction. Buildings with airtight construction will experience a different effect than those with leaky construction. The effect of atmospheric pressure on indoor air circulation is also influenced by the building's occupancy and the amount of air being circulated. Buildings with high occupancy and high air circulation will experience a different effect than those with low occupancy and low air circulation.
