

Native HERBACEOUS WETLAND Species

By PINELANDS NURSERY - The Native Plants Specialists

Herbaceous wetlands are some of the most diverse and productive ecosystems in the world. They serve as important habitat for a variety of species: from microbes that feed on detritus, to pollinators that harvest nectar and pollen from flowering plants, to larger mammals, reptiles and birds that rely on herbaceous wetlands for food and shelter.

Herbaceous wetlands act like a sponge during rain events, storing huge volumes of storm water reducing the threat of flooding. Sediment and other pollutants are then filtered out of the water before it soaks into the ground, replenishing the water table.

Perhaps the most important role of herbaceous wetlands is the synergistic relationship between bacteria and plant roots where massive amounts nitrogen are fixed under anaerobic conditions. This nitrogen is then absorbed by plant roots, converted into organic matter which is then available for animal consumption.
