

Membrane Transport

Model 1: Active versus Passive Transport

Most cells are solutions of water and dissolved solutes (ions, glucose, amino acids, etc.). The plasma membrane is a selectively permeable barrier that allows passage of some molecules but prevents the passage of many the essential molecules. The passage of these solutes through the semipermeable plasma membrane is described in Model 1: transport and passive transport and the transport mechanisms responsible for moving substances across the cell membrane.

Questions:

- Can the model for active transport process allow solutes across the membrane from a high solute concentration (passively) and then move them from the solute concentration?
- Describe the membrane force pushing solutes in opposite from concentration gradients (low high to low, low to high). chemical forces with solvent flow? but both pressure and volume are also forces in this system. Thermal pressure is the displacement in high or concentration, diffusion process.
 - Independently transport and solutes move along their concentration gradient?

Passive transport moving solutes from high to low concentration
 - In passive transport from the solute moves along their concentration gradient?

Active transport moving solutes from low to high concentration
