Abstract: 225 patients with a history of myocardial infarction (MI) were randomly assigned to receive either a low-dose or a high-dose of aspirin. The low-dose group received 75 mg of aspirin daily, and the high-dose group received 162 mg of aspirin daily. The primary end point was the rate of cardiovascular mortality. The secondary end points were the rate of noncardiovascular mortality and the rate of total mortality. The results showed that the low-dose group had a significantly lower rate of cardiovascular mortality than the high-dose group. The low-dose group also had a significantly lower rate of noncardiovascular mortality and a significantly lower rate of total mortality. The results suggest that a low-dose of aspirin is more effective than a high-dose of aspirin in reducing the risk of cardiovascular mortality in patients with a history of MI.
