Nursing is a multifaceted profession that includes specialists in many areas related to healthcare and administration. The qualifications of a DNP-prepared nurse are built on one's experience working with patients and other professionals and are rooted in the values of nursing. However, they are also strengthened by education that includes such areas as collaboration, business, leadership, and advocacy. Thus, DNP-nurses have to gain a deeper insight into the state of healthcare locally and nationwide in order to understand their place in changing the existing system for the better. The materials reviewed in this course challenged my view of communication, marketing, and business strategies as valuable to becoming a nurse leader.

During the course of education to become a nurse, students are taught how to work in a team of other specialists – nurses and other healthcare providers – who have their own expertise and priorities. Nevertheless, the DNP-level education urges future nurse leaders to consider the process of building such relationships and maintaining them on an organizational scale. Leadership in clinical practice requires one to improve collaboration and communication skills, find a connection with other professionals and establish networks built on trust and respect (Tussing et al., 2018). This knowledge is necessary when a nurse is a part of the team, but it is invaluable if the nurse is a team leader. Thus, when learning about intra- and interprofessional collaboration, I tried to learn as much as possible to understand how relationship building changes from the leader's perspective.

Another important point that I had to arrive at was that DNP-prepared nurses had to balance patient care and organizational needs. As leaders and advocates, DNP-prepared nurses partake in financial, marketing, business, information, and other types of management in the organization where they work. Therefore, it is vital for them to learn how to pay attention to patient needs, nurse advocacy, and organizational goals at the same time (McCauley et al., 2020). Moreover, nurses should ensure their professional objectives continue protecting and helping the community they serve. The quality of life of the population and people's health should remain at the center of any activity that nurse leaders perform, although their actions may not always impact patient health directly.

construction is realized in the form of people undertaking distinct interdependent activities which require effective leadership. The industry faces many challenges including demanding client requirements and project parameters, more stringent regulations, codes and systems, intense competition in the industry and threats from disruptive enterprise. In such a complex environment, technology driven and tool based project and corporate management is insufficient. It must be complemented by a strategic, genuine stakeholder focused and ethical leadership. Leadership in the Construction Industry is based on a study on authentic leadership and its development in Singapore. Leadership theories and concepts are reviewed, the importance of leadership in the construction industry is discussed and the grounded theory approach which was applied in the study is explained. Many eminent construction professionals in Singapore were interviewed in the field study. Emerging from the experiences of the leaders documented in this book are three major themes: 1. self leadership: how leaders engage in various self related processes such as self awareness, self regulation and role modeling; 2. self transcendent leadership: how leaders go beyond leading themselves to leading others through servant leadership, shared leadership, spiritual leadership and socially responsible leadership; and finally 3. sustainable leadership: the strategies leaders employ to make the impact of their leadership lasting. A synthesis of these themes and their implications for leadership development is presented before the book concludes with some recommendations for current and aspiring leaders about how they can engage with them. This book is essential reading for all construction practitioners from all backgrounds and researchers on leadership and management in construction.
