

By analysing timeless texts, in conjunction with an understanding of their context, the trend toward the erosion of enduring national, cultural, and religious dogma is unambiguous. In discarding these traditional sources of societal meaning, stable and predictable homogeneity is replaced with flexibility and nuance. Henrik Ibsen's piece bien faite A Doll's House (1879) and Tim Winton's postmodern anthology The Turning (2014) explore this literary dynamic by representing both the order and violence of traditional gender roles respectively. In humanising the dualism between the masculine and the feminine, Ibsen delicately conveys the subtle Scandinavian foibles within traditional relationship paradigms, while Winton confronts his readers with the ugly intensity of passion and possessiveness within a modern Australian context.

Henrik Ibsen's A Doll's House provides a cautionary tale against the exploitation of gender stereotypes, by both man and womankind, by denouncing malicious manipulation in pursuit of superficial personal gain. Ibsen employed the rhetorical device of categoria, where Nora sought to obfuscate responsibility for committing fraud, by deceiving her husband by omission and indulging his hamartiac ego by enlivening the 'damsel in distress' archetype. Further, the playwright's use of euxesis, in Nora's disingenuous exaggerations of her vulnerability, fragility and incompetence, reveals that the adoption of the traits of victimhood do not, and should not, validate unapologetic immoral behaviour. Through the grandiloquence in Torvald's pledge, "I will be wholly and absolutely at your service", along with the deification and invective mimesis in "you helpless little mortal", Ibsen exposes the dual nature of Torvald as both an egomaniacal and a devoted husband. Therefore, the composer holds that ethics within relationships invariably exist along a spectrum which manically oscillates between praying upon the fatal flaws of a trusted confidant and taking personal responsibility and accountability. Thus, Ibsen's work represents a watershed moment within nineteenth century culture, where the feminine lens within literature allowed society to introspect and begin to appreciate their meaningful contribution to the zeitgeist as well as mainstream western literary canon.

Similarly, within The Turning (2014), Tim Winton enlivens the self-immolation of victims, who can force themselves to justify, rationalise and believe in the false idyllic realities of their oppressor's making. Through the free indirect discourse, constrained only by the third person iteration of a stream of consciousness aesthetic, Winton compels responders to experience the trauma of Raelene's relativistic reasoning. Evidently, this is the heroine's failure to balance principled living with her quixotic desperation for her husband to rehabilitate himself, where self-preservation is sacrificed and Rae is ultimately left abandoned in the allure of vain optimism. Within Rae's defensive statement, "It's not what you think, Max," the author uses cliché in her painfully unoriginal excuse to convey the hopelessness of being understood within the chaos of her abusive relationship. This inclusive narrative form forces readers to recognise that exploitation can be manifest in multiple forms, both with and without precedent. In the blasphemous expositional thought, "Thank Christ it's aluminium, she thought; be grateful there's a bit of give in it," Winton juxtaposes the force of her abuser with the resistance of aluminium through visceral tactile imagery. In this instance, the soulless metal is more forgiving than the hulking brute. In a more figurative sense, the aluminium could be interpreted as being imbued with the symbolism of her own resilience, which is quietly able to absorb attacks and weather storms. In this case, Rae becomes a surrogate for modern victims of dehumanising domestic abuse, where Winton does not apologise for her chillingly willful ignorance, which not only preserves the female protagonist's downward spiral, but deepens it. * * * This reveals the angst between traditionalism and progressivism in a modern Western context, where victims may find themselves too proud to seek help, yet too timid to break free, all while predators continue to evade self-awareness.
