2.2. Identifying the Problem

- Abstract

“An interesting question is whether a good system for a particular group of people necessarily or even more so must change their walking style and other characteristics progressively. It may be possible, for instance, to design a system that would require the progression of other characteristics. (This kind of thing grows increasingly common.) There is, however, no reason to believe that a good system is a suitable means of getting someone to walk in a particular way. It is possible that a good system will be a suitable means of getting someone to walk in a particular way.”

- Efficient resource allocation: The model can help allocate resources more effectively by identifying areas of high demand and low supply.

The second paragraph describes how the author's feelings about the subject changed over time.

- "Efficient" are those sublanguages of  $\lambda$ -calculus (i.e.,  $\lambda$ -terms) that have the same expressive power.
