Fig. 11. Schematic diagram that illustrates how computational models of human face processing (e.g., the "feature integration" model) are "open" versus "closed" systems. The model is "open" because it is able to integrate information from multiple sources (e.g., the visual system, the memory system, the language system, etc.) to produce a final output (e.g., the decision to "yes" or "no"). The model is "closed" because it is able to integrate information from multiple sources (e.g., the visual system, the memory system, the language system, etc.) to produce a final output (e.g., the decision to "yes" or "no").
