Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book without typos from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1911 edition. Excerpt II: WHAT TO SAY. The student of public speaking will do well to confine his first efforts to simple forms of speech making. Plain narrative and clear statement of fact should be his primary objects. The ornamental graces of rhetoric and oratory may advantageously be left for subsequent consideration.

His subject may be anything from a personal experience such as a visit to New York or London to a discussion of some social or political question of the day But whatever theme he choose to speak upon it is important that it be timely and of probable interest to his hearers The highest oratorical talents will not atone for an inappropriate choice of subject There are hundreds of vital topics in which most men are more or less interested A selection may be made from these Before attempting to write speeches of his own the student will find it profitable to examine those of others a good selection of which is provided in this volume Cicero says Since all the business and art of an orator is divided into five parts he ought first to find out what he should say next to arrange and dispose his matter not only in a certain order but with a sort of power and judgment then to clothe and deck his thoughts with language then to secure them in his memory and lastly to deliver them with dignity and grace I had learned and understood also that before we enter upon the main subject the minds of the audience should be conciliated by an exordium next that the case should be clearly stated then that the point in controversy should be established then that what we may maintain should be supported by proof and that whatever was said on the other side should be refuted and that in the conclusion of our speech whatever was in our
