But since a reference to all abstract generalizations is "very roughly made" (p. 100), we cannot avoid the charge that the argument is circular. If generalizations are true, then the argument is successful. If generalizations are false, then the argument is unsuccessful. But that is the very point of the argument. The argument is successful if and only if the generalizations are true. But that is the very point of the argument. The argument is successful if and only if the generalizations are true. But that is the very point of the argument.
