

The water was pretty, but Dave thought the hills surrounding it were maybe the coolest things he'd ever seen. They rose from the Earth in a hundred different sizes, green with trees and grass, dotted with the occasional house or lighthouse tower. Once the East Town dock disappeared into the morning fog, he couldn't see flat ground in any direction.

He'd started drinking early. He hadn't planned it that way, but a number of factors—free rum and the annoying gaggle of tourists they shared the boat with chief among them—made him reconsider. After the usual security speech, a crew member had emptied a brown glass bottle into a punch-filled thermos with "A" scratched across the frost and informed his passengers that it had better be dry by the time they returned to town. Given the circumstances, Dave was happy to oblige.

The hills had also captured Jake's imagination. He watched them with rapt attention, rarely breaking his gaze to look down at the water. Dave considered saying something, but the rum had chilled him out considerably. What did it matter what the kid was looking at? His having a good time was all that really mattered.

"When can I touch the fish?" A fat little boy belonging to one of the other families asked. He was fair-haired and sunburned and thoroughly inept. His red little cheeks puffed out as he crossed a set of meaty arms over his chest. It was a shame, Dave thought, that his parents didn't simply throw him over the side when they thought nobody was looking. He certainly would have played dumb if the cops wanted to ask him a few questions about it afterward.

"Honey," said an equally chunky woman Dave assumed to be the kid's mom, "we'll see them when we snorkel, but I don't know that you'll get to touch one. They're a lot faster than us in the water. They might try to get away."

"She's right," the kid's dad said. He took a long pull from his red party cup and shook his head like someone underestimating the strength of his beverage. "This isn't a petting zoo. It's the ocean."

The kid stomped a fat, sandaled foot down on the deck. In the moment, Dave would have given half his income to see the kid slip and go overboard. He grinned at the thought of his chubby arms peeking above the crystal clear water, his fat fingers clinching and opening as he waved for help.

Pretty grim there, Davey. He took a pull and looked at Jake. For once he and the voice were in agreement. There was no reason to wish death or the loss of a child on someone. Not until the little boy touched him or something.

Dave stretched back in his seat and thumbed to a random page in his book: some breezy, unauthorized biography of Sinatra he'd found stowed away in a forgotten corner of his luggage. He vaguely remembered snagging the paperback from the house on his last trip to the island. He remembered knocking several books back that month, all while having time to record and enjoy the island. Had the days been longer then? Now going to the grocery seemed to take half a day. Recreational reading was something he had to plan for.

He glanced at Jake and wondered how time was progressing for him. It was hard to tell if the kid knew how lucky he was. Dave didn't even leave Indiana until he was 12, and that was for some unknown uncle's funeral in Michigan. There were no glass-bottom boat tours in Now.

The boat slowed to an idle. A lean, bronzed boat staffer stepped to the front of the boat and cleared his throat.
