

ENGLISH III

Point: "Life After High School"

For a recent high school graduate, now is the best time to move far away from home because moving to a new place offers more independence, new experiences, and increased awareness about the world.

Gain Independence

According to Entrepreneur and the 2011 Current Population Survey, about 57% of people in the United States move each year. This percentage puts Americans only slightly behind the most frequent movers in the world, the French and the Dutch. Considering that the United States was founded by people moving from England to escape the restrictions of their old lives, and today's young adults moving seems to fit an important part of our national character.

One of the main reasons to move far away from home after high school is to gain more independence. At home, young adults have to follow their parents' or grandparents' rules. Even if those young adults move far away from home, their day-to-day lives are often surrounded by similar rules, and hearing constant advice from family and old friends. In another place, whether at a college or at a new job in a new city, young adults will be able to make their own rules and form their own habits.

Some people argue that moving far away will make it harder for young adults to get help if they need it. It's true that parents cannot easily rush to get their children if they live hundreds of miles apart, but depending on the situation, they can actually be a benefit. For example, if young adults have already had health prepared by a parent,
