Plot Summary

Gasland is a 2013 American documentary film that explores the controversy surrounding the use of hydraulic fracturing, also known as "fracking," which has become a controversial method of extracting oil and natural gas from shale rock formations. The film follows a group of people who are fighting against the use of fracking in their communities, and it shows how the government has been involved in the process. The film is a powerful and thought-provoking work that raises important questions about the future of energy and the environment.
