

80. P. 128, l. 1.—Athanasius in his book de Synodis writes in a like strain; “Having rejected all these things, as if they had invented better, they promulge another Creed, which they wrote at Sirmium in Latin, but it was translated into Greek.” And Hilarius, in recording this Creed in his book de Synodis, prefixes to it this title: “A copy of the blasphemy composed at Sirmium by Hosius and Potamius.” Valesius informs us that the Potamius here mentioned was bishop of Lisbon, and at first a defender of the Catholic faith, but that he was afterwards induced to corrupt the faith by the reward of a farm belonging to the emperor’s revenue, on which he had set his heart. Hosius of Corduba amongst the Churches in Spain detected this man, and repelled him as an impious heretic. But even Hosius himself, being summoned before the emperor Constantius on the complaint of this Potamius, and terrified with threats, and being old and rich, was fearful of banishment or proscription, and so yielded to the impiety.
