

HUMAN SCALE

Human scale refers to the feeling of bigness—something if the dimensions of an interior space or the sizes of its elements make us feel small, we can say they are not in scale. If, on the other hand, the space does not feel too small, or if the elements offer a comfortable fit with our physical requirements of reach, clearance, or movement, say they are human in scale.

The elements we use to ascertain human scale are those dimensions we have become accustomed to contact and use. These include doorways, stairs, counters, and various types of seating. These elements can be used to humanize a space that would otherwise lack human scale.

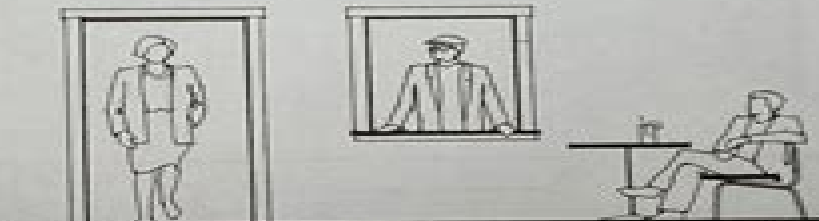

Details near eye level can be used to bring the scale of a large architectural space down to human size. For example, a tall wall along a wall creates a visual line at roughly hand height. Similarly, moderately scaled artwork and accessories make an imposing space feel more comfortable.

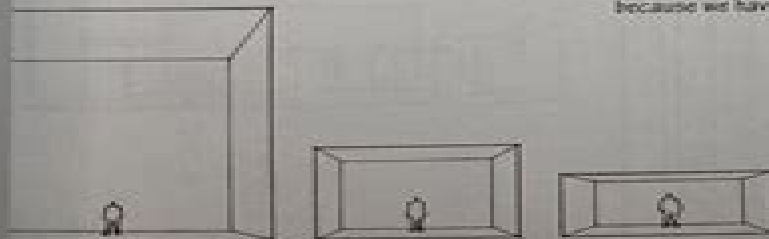

We can judge the scale of a space by the relative size of the interior elements within it.

Small-scale space

We often use doorways, windowsills, tables, and chairs to discern human scale because we have become accustomed to their dimensions.

In Scale

The feeling of smallness or bigness a space or an interior element gives us
