Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the performance of a simulated 1000-m sprint. The program consisted of 12 weeks of interval training, with the duration of the intervals increasing from 100 to 1000 m. The results showed that the subjects improved their performance significantly, with the mean time decreasing from 10.5 to 8.5 min. The subjects also showed a significant improvement in their heart rate, with the mean heart rate decreasing from 180 to 160 beats per minute. The subjects also showed a significant improvement in their lactate threshold, with the mean lactate threshold increasing from 4.0 to 5.0 mmol per liter. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week training program can significantly improve the performance of a simulated 1000-m sprint.

THE Journal of the American Medical Association (JAMA) has published a study that suggests that the use of a computerized decision support system (DSS) can improve the quality of medical care. The study, conducted by researchers at the University of Michigan, found that the DSS helped physicians make more accurate diagnoses and recommended treatments. The researchers also found that the DSS helped physicians to identify potential drug interactions and other safety concerns. The study was conducted in a simulated environment, but the researchers believe that the findings could be applied to real-world clinical settings. The DSS used in the study was called "CARE" (Computerized Assessment and Recommendation Engine). It was designed to help physicians make decisions about patient care by providing them with relevant information and suggesting potential actions. The researchers found that the DSS was particularly helpful in cases where the physician was unsure of the correct diagnosis or treatment. They also found that the DSS helped to reduce the time it took for a physician to make a decision. Overall, the study suggests that the use of a DSS can improve the quality of medical care and reduce the risk of errors.
