Glass is one of the most versatile materials in architecture. It can be used in a wide range of ways, from a simple window to a complex, multi-layered system. The most common use of glass is in windows, which allow light to enter a building and provide a view of the outside world. However, glass can also be used in a variety of other ways, such as in doors, partitions, and decorative elements.

From light to glass to structural building material

For many years, glass was used primarily for windows and doors. However, in the 19th century, glass was used for the first time as a structural material. This was done in the form of glass panes that were used to create a transparent, load-bearing wall. This was a major breakthrough in architecture, as it allowed for the creation of large, open spaces that were previously impossible to achieve with traditional building materials.

The first glass skyscraper was built in 1884 in Chicago. It was a 10-story building that was made entirely of glass. This was a major achievement, as it showed that glass could be used as a structural material for tall buildings. Since then, glass has become a popular material for skyscrapers and other tall buildings.
