Abstract: The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The study was conducted in a community-based setting. The participants were 30 women, aged 40-50 years, who were sedentary and had no history of cardiovascular disease. They were randomly assigned to two groups: a training group and a control group. The training group participated in a 12-week program of aerobic exercise, strength training, and flexibility exercises, three times per week. The control group remained sedentary. The physical health outcomes measured were body mass index (BMI), waist circumference, and blood pressure. The psychological health outcomes measured were self-reported stress, anxiety, and depression. The results showed that the training group had significantly lower BMI, waist circumference, and blood pressure compared to the control group at the end of the 12-week program. Additionally, the training group reported significantly lower levels of stress, anxiety, and depression compared to the control group. These findings suggest that a 12-week training program can improve the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women.
