But when the business comes for the solution, the entrepreneur has the history, the understanding of the customers, the key relationships, the contacts, the capability to get resources to succeed in the business. And so, with funding, the entrepreneur is creating a vehicle for the business to move forward, not to become the general manager of the firm. In general, managers like to work on mathematical strategy, the staffing and organizing people, which means building the firm. Entrepreneurs like building the firm and winning the market, but use a limited number of people to get used to their management. Because they understand the business, they know the customers, and the mathematics of organizing different people and operations.

Offshore financial centers (OFCs) have long been a primary way to avoid taxes and to avoid a variety of other taxes and financial constraints. Beginning in the 1970s, companies began to use OFCs to manage their global tax liabilities. In addition, OFCs have been used to manage their global financial and operational risks. The growing popularity of OFCs has led to a number of new OFCs, including the Cayman Islands, the British Virgin Islands, and the Bahamas.
