

Suggested Style for Survey of Forest Ecology Laboratory Reports

1. Introduction

Research, a studious critical inquiry and examination aimed at the discovery and interpretation of new knowledge, is a vital part of every professional's job. Research is not just something done by scientists working at universities or independent laboratories, but is an activity in which every professional resource manager is involved and which sets professionals apart from technicians. The code of ethics of nearly every profession dictates that practitioners use only the most up-to-date information and technology to perform their tasks; to do this requires research! Whether the critical inquiry and interpretation is done to purchase a new timber tract, retool a pulp mill, or develop a new management strategy for spotted owl, it is still research. Inevitably, research involves designing a study, collecting and analyzing data, and presenting the results, often in the form of a written report. The process of writing, evaluating, and rewriting research findings makes the author think more deeply about the work. Accurate, clear, and concise writing is essential to effective communication among professionals. The research reports you will prepare will provide writing experience different from that associated with a library term paper. A research report is based on one's own data and involvement in an organized investigation.

2. General Format and Style

A widely accepted format for research reports is one that begins with a title and a by-line identifying what the work is about and who did it, followed by sections such as Introduction, Methods and Materials, Results, Discussion, Summary and/or Conclusions, and Literature Cited. Often, an abstract at the beginning of the paper will appear in place of a summary at the end. This format serves as a framework for a more detailed outline which must be prepared before the paper is constructed.

The style of a research report varies depending on the intended audience. Most professional writers and editors find that the style of research reports is poor, largely because the authors lack experience and/or training in technical writing. A good reference for a "beginning" biological writer is the CBE Style Manual (Council of Biological Editors 1978). There are numerous texts on technical writing that would also be helpful. The following general guidelines, gleaned from many of these sources, will help your writing (and paper grades) if used.

- a. Considerable debate still rages about the use of the first person ("I" or "we") in technical writing. For now, do not use the first person. By the same token, do not use indirect statements like "this author" or "these researchers." For example, when describing how tree diameters were taken, you might write: "The diameters, at 4.5 ft above ground, of ten trees on each plot were measured to the nearest 0.1 inch using a caliper."
- b. All manuscripts should be typed double-spaced, with one-inch margins all around. Do not hyphenate words or right-justify; an uneven margin is of little concern.
- c. Do not use footnotes, and avoid the use of direct quotations. Direct quotations are reserved for rare instances in technical writing when it is impossible to improve on the original wording, or when the wording itself is the object of comment. Use the style for citations given in section 6 below.
