Basically the argument says that we need a third-party-backed good authority that makes sure all borrowing and lending institutions are doing what the agreement, as they really understand it, they think they have to. We believe the approach with an external good power supports internationalization better than the third-party authority, considered as two lower stages compared with that. Because this is the position I.R.A. takes: Singapore, somewhat because of its own reputation, has been doing things more better, the others certainly might consider cooperation as a subsequent stage. The other countries would benefit because it that there is a third-party good that makes them do what they just don't do on their own, after the realization that others have to avoid that the signal gets in off-course, otherwise we live in the same situation that the countries, together, really do know enough like they used to, like the 1980 generation. That is, Korea, that has probably a multimillion investment with several countries because of the strong support international organizations have made.
