Cardiac Conduction

The heart has its own system to generate and conduct nerve impulses and conduct actually means the heart is highly electric. This electrical system is called the cardiac conduction system. It is made up of specialized tissues and cells producing the heart's nerve impulses directly to the atria and ventricles, coordinating its motion. In the normal cardiac cycle, the left and right atria contract together first followed by the contraction of the ventricles together.

The cardiac conduction system is composed:

located in the central part:

1. The Sinoatrial Node

Also known as the pacemaker, this node sends waves of electric signals originating the electrical impulse that will control the heartbeat.

2. The Atrioventricular Node is located between the two ventricles that coordinates the heart rate and continues the electrical signal down into the ventricles.

3. The Purkinje Fibers

These branching carry the electrical impulses to the ventricles, causing a contraction. The impulses start at the Sinoatrial Node, continue into the right atrial branch and left bundle branch, continue to Purkinje fibers, spread throughout the ventricles.

The Heartbeat

The sinoatrial (SA) node begins the contraction by sending an impulse through both atria, causing them to contract just as the atrioventricular (AV) node. The AV node continues the impulse, sending it into the bundle of the right atrial bundle branches, and into Purkinje fibers within the ventricles causing both ventricles to contract.

As the impulse moves through the heart, cardiac muscle cells contract, as the cells depolarize. Depolarization is caused by a flood of ions (sodium and potassium) across the cell membranes, which the cells and therefore cardiac muscle tissue, to contract. When the impulse first passes, the cardiac cells contract to be able to contract other impulses. This electrical depolarization and others allow the ions move back through the cell membrane, causing the cardiac muscle to stop.

The SA node will create impulses from 100-110 electrical impulses per minute. Each of these impulses causes your heart to beat and translates to (one heart beat). The electrical impulse causes the heart to depolarize and contract, followed by repolarization and relaxation, at a constant rate. The normal rhythm and rate is called the sinus rhythm. The cardiac conduction system is also responsible for changing or decreasing the number of electrical impulses depending on the amount of oxygen.
