

SECTION 1 - CHARGE & TURNTABLE

EPF Assembly

The EPF assembly is a combination Low Pressure Regulator and a Fuel Cell Assembly. The fuel cell is an electronic valve which is controlled by an internal microprocessor. The microprocessor provides output signals to the ECM and receives input signals from a CAN BUS network. The microprocessor also receives electrical signals from the Fuel Pressure Sensor (FPS) and the Fuel Temperature Sensor (FTS) and converts them into data to the ECM. The ECM uses the FPS and FTS data to calculate the location of the secondary fuel in the EPF and sends that data back to the EPF via the CAN BUS. The internal microprocessor in the EPF will then output a signal which causes the valve solenoid to move and position the secondary fuel in the correct location.

Low Pressure Regulator (LPR)

The LPR is a combination regulator pressure regulating device. The LPR is a negative pressure low pressure regulator that is normally closed when the engine is not running. When the engine is running, sufficient vacuum will be taken from the secondary chamber from the main fueling the secondary diaphragm down into the spring loaded line and opening the secondary valve allowing regulated fuel to pass to the valve. The mechanical action in conjunction with the EPF maintains constant the increased action on the second air line causing it to open when allowing more fuel to flow to the motor.

NOTE

For best use, the fuel cell is an electronic valve which is controlled by an internal microprocessor. The microprocessor provides output signals to the ECM and receives input signals from a CAN BUS network.

Air Fuel Valve

The air valve valve is an air-fuel mixing device and is a non-piloted self-contained. The valve is an air valve design, utilizing a relatively constant pressure drop to draw fuel into the valve from existing air-fuel flow. The valve is mounted in the air stream ahead of the throttle control device.

When the engine begins to start, it draws in air with the air valve creating the slight negative pressure begins to build. The negative pressure signal is communicated to the top of the air valve through a vacuum port in the fuel valve assembly. A pressure-flow indicator begins to build when the air valve diaphragm between the air valve sensor (FPS) and the air valve assembly is fully depressed.

any change the secondary diaphragm is down further down forcing the secondary valve open to open valve.

Electronic Throttle Control (ETC)

Engine speed and fuel control are determined by the ECM. Fueling is proportional to the ECM software and the throttle position sensor. The ECM is responsible for opening control into the engine. The Electronic Throttle Control device or "throttle body assembly" is connected to the intake manifold of the engine. The electronic throttle control device utilizes an electric motor connected to the throttle shaft. When the engine is running, electrical signals are sent from the equipment controller to the engine ECM when the operator depresses an equipment throttle switch. The ECM then sends an electrical signal to the motor on the electronic throttle control to increase or decrease the angle of the throttle body thus increasing or decreasing the air-fuel flow to the engine.

The electronic throttle control device also incorporates two internal Throttle Position Sensors (TPS) which provide output signals to the ECM as to the location of the throttle shaft and valve. The TPS information is used by the ECM to control speed and fuel control in the engine control.

SECTION 2 - CHARGE & TURNTABLE

Engine Control Module

To obtain maximum efficiency from the engine and a control over of the air-fuel ratio, the engine control module is equipped with an onboard computer or engine control module (ECM). The ECM is a microcontroller which receives input data from various sensors that are connected to the engine and fuel system and then outputs various signals to control engine operation.

The specific function of the controller is to maintain "closed loop" fuel control. Closed loop fuel control is accomplished when the exhaust gas oxygen sensor (EGO) mounted in the exhaust system sends a voltage signal to the controller. The controller then calculates any correction that may need to be made to the air-fuel ratio. The controller then outputs signals to the EPS to correct the amount of fuel being supplied to the motor. At the same time the ECM may correct the throttle body position to correct speed and fuel of the engine.

The controller also performs diagnostic functions on the fuel system and controls the operation of the fuel system by sending a signal to the fuel system (light blue) connected to the fuel control system and the fuel control system. The fuel system is the system as identified by a diagnostic code number in
