- 10 The de minimis threshold for recognising that a state has exercised control is related to the state's financial resources
- 11 The extent and nature of the control within the territory may vary from the complete state to its exercise in representative form or by another authority
- 12 The territorial control may be a permanent or temporary one, related to the given state's hegemony. This applies to the concept of legal control in international law
- 13 While every legal control involves the use of territorial resources to rule and exert power, the degree of control is variable and partial control may exist. The complete state power will be an exceptional form of power
- 14 Control may be given up over the territory gradually. It may also be continuously under state rule and therefore be under effective control of the state's government and state authorities
- 15 It is not a state's power which could give the ground its appearance, except if treated as a foreign power (foreign presence) – sovereignty
- 16 The government, foreign power, could give the ground its appearance based on state's own power
